

Worth repeating

Greenville Journal 4/25/08

“There are so many women in combat zones now days that we didn’t have to rely on guys in drag.”

Greenville playwright John Culbertson on his play, “Messiah on the Frigidaire,” making its international debut at Camp Bucca in Iraq.

Hats off to the derby.

“We wanted to showcase the art of our students. We never intended to offend anyone.” J.L. Mann Principal Susan Hughes on complaints that timeline stones made by students for the school’s front walkway included religious and patriotic symbols that shouldn’t be walked on.

“I know you’ve been having a good time because I’ve been tending the bar.”

Greenville resident Marty Flynn addressing a brunch crowd during the Blockhouse Steeplechase weekend.

“Hang on. Put your dues in. If you love football, stay.” Jerry Wellmaker, director for the S.C. Officials Association’s Greenville district, to new recruits.

“You think you know football? You don’t football.” Dean Waters, a South Carolina football line judge, talking about the challenges of learning the game.

Photos by Michelle Mogavero/Staff

Hey, next time make it a double-shot, half-caff, light-foam, no-whip, extra-hot mocha.

“What kind of region do we want to leave for future generations? Do we want to become another Atlanta or do we want to be a region that both accommodates growth and protects the quality of life?” Brad Wyche, Upstate Forever executive director.

“We’ve done a good job in protecting important lands and resources, but with development consuming land in our region at the mind-boggling rate of 90 acres per day, we must do more. Those goals will be our focus over the next 10 years – advocating for these policies and protecting more lands.” Erwin Maddrey, former Upstate Forever board chairman.